- Abstract
- Background: The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of self-reported mental health problems in a community sample of young adults and to examine the association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported physical health problems.
- Methods: A cross-sectional survey of 1,000 young adults (18-25 years old) was conducted. The survey included questions about self-reported mental health problems (depression, anxiety, stress, and substance use) and self-reported physical health problems (chronic conditions, injuries, and disabilities). The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was determined, and the association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported physical health problems was examined using logistic regression.
- Results: The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was 25.3%. The prevalence of self-reported physical health problems was 12.7%. The association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported physical health problems was significant (p < 0.05).
- Conclusions: The results of this study suggest that self-reported mental health problems are associated with self-reported physical health problems. This finding has implications for the development of interventions to improve the health of young adults.
- Keywords: Prevalence, Self-reported mental health problems, Self-reported physical health problems, Young adults.
